Lined together by the closest tie of friendship, two prospectors, Miller Kent and Ned, having partners on the great Western plains, come to the parting of the ways. The love of adventure unceasingly put aside for his duty to his girl wife, Miller Kent journeys with her and their little daughter, Molly, to the far west, to meet his partner, Ned, and the wife of his partner, his only child, Glory, continue on the long trail alone. About to give up in despair, Ned in a moment of weakness upon a great lake, hidden in the dark recesses of the mountains, therein lies a treasure in rich oil. He has to register his claim, the number of which is 1743. A broken body, he calls an Italian setting women to his side and instructs her to fashion for him two bracelets, in one to inscribe the figure "1743" in the other "343". These bracelets are to be identical. He places one on the arm of his little daughter, charging her never to remove it, and the other he gives to the Italian woman, bidding her search for Miller Kent and deliver it to him. Later, the little girl, Glory, upon the death of her father, is adopted by a craftsman named Billings and the Italian woman, upon her death, having been unsuccessful in delivering the bracelet into the hands of Kent, turns it over to the unsuspicious James Meek.
